Improved efficiency with LEAN construction

Stylish liveability

The district around Hamburg's Stresemannstrasse is a colourful, flourishing mixed-use area containing many multi-storey houses dating back to the Gruenderzeit period in the late nineteenth century. To help the new student accommodation facility to blend into the streetscape, the architectural design features a three-part façade in place of a solid block building with a uniform façade concept. The roof area is literally pleated, reflecting the small units of existing constructions.

Efficiency improved by LEAN construction

This project only allowed a small area for site facilities and a delivery zone. Moreover, the site is adjacent to two very busy roads, Stresemannstrasse and Kieler Strasse. PORR experts were therefore required to bring their experience of LEAN standards to bear on the digital schedule and cycle planning and the logistical control of the construction site.
